CHAPTER X FIRST PRINCIPLES IN POLITICS 58. Appearance and Reality Use of the naturalistic concept as a principle of valuation does not escape the pressure of subjectivism that has been found to clog its practical application in methodology, but here at least logical defense against illusion is readily available. Corrective influence from this source may be made so familiar as to cause the reality to be substituted for the appearance as a habit of thought. Although one may seem to see the sun rise any clear morning, every educated person is unhesitatingly aware that what really happens is quite different from the appearance. Some analogous education of ability to distinguish between reality and appearance is a prerequisite to successful use of the naturalistic concept as a determinant. One must be prepared for the contingency of conflict with instinctive prepossessions or traditional notions. The matter may be illustrated by the case of insects which all biologists admit are products of social evolution. If a bee or ant be conceived to possess self-consciousness its sense of autonomous individuality might be complete despite the fact that in the social insects individuality is socially created and maintained. To ordinary view, what might be called common sense, an isolated social bee or ant is a complete individual. Only patient, trained observation has disclosed the fact that apparently complete individuals are so dependent upon the arrangements of the community that apart from it some of the adult forms can...
